| Comments                      | There are more options available than this surely there is a way to invest in initiatives to tackle the problem at source rather than keep putting sticky plasters over it? If there is a more environmentally friendly way to do something then that is what you should do. My son has asthma and fumes will affect his health. Government and their acting agencies have a duty to ensure the health and wellbeing of the general public. If this is going to diminish the current level of air quality in any way then it should not even be a consideration. No option that reduces the quality of life or increases the risk to people and the environment should be a viable one - find another way - be more innovative and invest properly in the right things. |
