Comments	I drive to Newhaven frequently and find it astonishing that the incinerator is allowed to dwarf an entire town. It's like that spaceship on Independence Day when it dwarfs Washington and can be seen for miles, only this won't fly away. It's a permanant ugly feature. The visual impact by positioning an incinerator at Ford will be far worse than the one at Newhaven. A much bigger population and seen from a much further distance. So I strongly object on visual grounds. However, now that we're conveniently past an election (that was well timed!) and therefore anticpating you will pass this anyway, may I strongly suggest that you impose conditions concerning it's future redundancy and demolition? You don't want this to be like the cooling towers at Sandwich, or the Shoreham Cement works, that sit redundant for decades after their usual life. There should be a condition to pull the site down if it's unoperational for x years, or to impose a temporay planning consent (in the same way that wind farms often only have PP for 25 years).
