Comments	I would strongly like to object to this monstrosity in the middle of beautiful countryside with pollutants being spewed all over us from its very high 2 chimney stacks! Yes they will say it is clean technology but it never really works out that way does it! The building itself is enormous and since I live very close to the proposed site, it is going to be a complete eye sore on the landscape. Then there is the matter of lots more lorries on our local roads again spewing out yet more pollution, clogging up the roads and this is supposed to be improving things? I don't think so to say the least. As I am within 700 yards of all of this and it is going to severely affect the price of my house, I will take this matter to court if it does come about and seek compensation from the companies responsible. Lots of my friends in the area feel the same way, so we will all get together and take legal action. This comes up every couple of years now that these people apply for planning permission and we are sick to death of it as it is a consistent blight on the horizon with no end in sight to how many times they are going to keep coming back until they finally get permission! The two chimney stacks are as high as Chichester Cathedral, is this really what we want in an area of outstanding natural beauty? The two are totally at odds with each other and the whole point of planning, in my experience, is that whatever is being constructed should fit in with its surroundings! There is no need for more local incinerators so why is this being proposed? I, along with lots of other local people, are having meetings about this and action of some description will be taken, that is for certain! If this is given planning permission it will be the start of things, not the end!!!
