On the Isle of Wight, we have dealt with UKOG in the past. I would urge you to engage with professional geologists to analyse their application from a risk/ benefit standpoint. UKOG had slick presentations but could not demonstrate in depth knowledge of the strata they were exploring. The south of England has a complex geological history that they had glossed over to sell shares. We suspected it might have been a ploy to keep investors interested in their company but couldn't definitively prove it. Nonetheless they left.

If they haven't struck oil in Sussex so far, one suspects that they might be covering their nether parts with their shareholders at your expense. Get a second opinion.
